

Trent Strengthens Ties with Rising Nigerian University at ICAV Symposium May 06, 2008

During the African Roundtable event that took place on May 5 as part of the Sixth Symposium of the International Consortium on Anti-Virals (ICAV), Trent University expanded its network of international academic partnerships by establishing formal relations with Redeemer's University of Nigeria.

In the spirit of global cooperation, a new memorandum of understanding was officially signed by both Trent president and vice-chancellor Bonnie M.

Patterson and Professor Oyewale Tomori, vice-chancellor of Redeemer's University.

This agreement is designed to enhance relations between the two universities in order to foster academic and cultural interchange in the areas of education and research. In addition, both institutions commit to working together toward the internationalization of higher education.

Both universities stand to benefit in many ways, with new opportunities to develop joint research projects, joint conferences, faculty and student exchanges, and joint cultural programs. Trent University and Redeemer's University are both supporters of ICAV.

Based in Redemption City, Nigeria, Redeemer's University is a private university offering four-year Bachelor Degree programs through three colleges including the College of Humanities, the College of Management Science and the College of Natural Sciences.

ICAV is a not-for profit drug development organization developing low-cost anti-viral drugs through its scientific network of over 200 scientists from over 24 countries. ICAV's African Regional Office is located in Abuja, Nigeria.